"The Evolution of the New Era rests on the cornerstone of Knowledge and Beauty."
—Roerich.
The Great Gotama gave to the world a complete Teaching of the perfect construction of life. Each attempt to make a God of the great revolutionist, leads to absurdity.

Previous to Gotama there was, of course, a whole succession of those who bore the common welfare, but their teachings crumbled to dust in the course of millenniums. Therefore the Teaching of Gotama should be accepted as the first Teaching of the laws of matter and the evolution of the world. Contemporary understanding of the community permits a wondrous bridge from Buddha Gotama up to the present time. We pronounce this formula neither for extolling nor for demeaning, but as an evident and immutable fact.

The law of fearlessness, the law of the renunciation of property, the law of the valuation of labor, the law of the dignity of human personality, beyond castes and outer distinctions, the law of true knowledge, the law of love based upon self-knowledge, make of the covenants of the Teachers a continuous rainbow of humanity.

Let us construct the foundations of Buddhism in its manifested covenants. The simple Teaching, equal in beauty to the Cosmos, will dispel every suggestion of idolatry, unworthy of the great Teacher of men.

Knowledge was the leading path of all great Teachers. Knowledge will permit a free and vital approach to the great Teaching, as vitally real as is great Matter itself.

We shall not introduce the latest complexities; we shall speak briefly about those foundations that cannot be denied.

Joy to all peoples! Joy to all those who labor!
In the foundations of Buddhism, one cannot pause over the most recent complications and ramifications. It is important to know that the idea of the purification of the Teaching is always alive in the Buddhist consciousness. Soon after the Teacher’s death the celebrated councils took place in Rajagriha, and after in Vessali and Patna, restoring the teaching to its original simplicity.

The principal schools of Buddhism existing are: the Mahāyāna (Tibet, Mongolia, the Kalmucks, the Buriats, China, Japan, Northern India) and the Hinayāna (Indo-China, Burma, Siam, Ceylon and India). But both of these schools remember equally well the qualities of the Teacher Himself.

The qualities of Buddha are Muni—the wise, from the clan of Cākya. Cākya Simha—Cākya, the Lion. Bhagavat—the Blessed One. Sadhu—the Teacher. Jina—the Conqueror. The Ruler of the Benevolent Law.
Of unusual beauty is the coming of the King in the image of a mighty mendicant. “Go, ye mendicants, bring salvation and benevolence to the peoples.” In this command of Buddha, in this term “mendicants” is contained all.

Understanding the Teaching of Buddha, you realize from where emanates the assertion of the Buddhists—“Buddha is a man.” The temple does not exist for Him, but there is a place of assembly and a temple of knowledge—the Tibetan du-khang and tsug-lag-khang.

Buddha disputed the conventional conception of God. Buddha denied the existence of an eternal and immutable soul. Buddha gave the teaching for every day. Buddha struggled forcefully against possession. Buddha fought personally against the fanaticism of castes and the privileges of classes. Buddha had the realization of the life of the universe in its full reality. Buddha laid the foundations of the community, foreseeing the victory of the community of the world.

Hundreds of millions of worshippers of Buddha are scattered throughout the world and each of them affirms: “I take refuge in Buddha, I take refuge in the Teaching, I take refuge in the Samgha.”

The Buddhist written traditions and our contemporary researches have established a series of details of the life of Gotama Buddha. Buddha’s death is ascribed by the majority of investigators to the year 483 B. C. The age of the Teacher at his death is given as about 80 years. The place of the birth of the Teacher is known as Kapilavastu, situated in the Nepalese Terai. The royal line of Cākyas, to which Gotama belonged, is known.

Undoubtedly all biographies of the great Teacher have been greatly elaborated by his contemporaries and followers, especially in the most recent writings, but in order to preserve the coloring and the character of the epoch, we must to a certain extent refer to the traditional exposition.

According to the traditions of the sixth century B. C. the domain of Kapilavastu existed in North India, in the foothills of the Himalayas; was popu-
Up to now, four sites in India have drawn the pilgrimages of devotees to the Teaching of the Blessed Buddha. His birthplace, Kapilavastu, was a city situated in the north of India, on the foothills of the Himalayas, at the source of the river Gandak, and was destroyed even during the life of Buddha. The place of His enlightenment, Bodhigāya, where was Uruvelā the grove, often mentioned, under the shade of which Gotama united all His attainments in illumination. The place of His first sermon, Sarnâth (near Benares), where, according to the legend, Buddha set in motion the wheel of the Law, and which up to now shows traces of ruins of most ancient communities. The place of His death—Kushinagara (Nepal).

In the notes of the Chinese traveler Fa-hsien (392-414), who visited India, we find a description of the domain of Kapilavastu as well as of other revered spots.

Despite these facts, despite the ancient columns of King Açoka, there are those who love to make of the Buddha a myth, and to separate this high Teaching from life. The French writer Senart, in a special work, affirms that Buddha was a solar myth. But here also science has restored the human personality of the Teacher, Gotama Buddha. The urn with part of the ashes and bones of Buddha, found in Piprava (Nepalese Terai) bearing a date and inscription, as well as an historical urn with some relics of the Teacher, buried by the King Kanishka and found near Peshawar, bear definite testimony to the death of the first Teacher of the world community, Gotama Buddha.

One should not think that the life of Gotama Buddha was spent in universal acknowledgment and quiet. On the contrary, there are indications of slander and all kinds of obstacles, through which the Teacher, as a true fighter, only strengthened Himself, thus augmenting the significance of His achievement. Many incidents speak about the hostility which He encountered from ascetics and Brahmins, who hated Him. The former for His reproval of their fanaticism, the latter for refusing to admit their rights to social privileges and to the knowledge of truth, by right of birth.
lated by numerous tribes of Çākyas, descendants of Ikshvāku of the solar race of Kshatriyas. They were ruled by the Elder of the clan who resided in the city of Kapilavastu, of which no traces are now left; during Buddha's time it was already destroyed by a hostile neighboring king. At that period, Čuddhodana, the last direct descendant of Ikshvāku, reigned at Kapilavastu. Of this king and Queen Māyā was born the future great Teacher, who received the name of Siddhārtha, which means—"He who fulfilled His purpose."

Visions and prophecies preceded His birth and the event itself, on the full moon-day of May, was attended with all propitious signs in heaven and on earth. Thus the great Rishi Asita dwelling in the Himalayas, having learned from the Devas that a Bodhisattva, the future Buddha, had been born to the world of men in the Lumbini Park and that He would turn the Wheel of the Doctrine, immediately set out on a journey to pay homage to the future Teacher of men. Reaching the palace of King Cuddhodana, he expressed the desire to see the newborn Bodhisattva. The King ordered the child to be brought to the Rishi, expecting his blessing. But the Rishi on seeing the child, first smiled and then wept. The King anxiously asked the reason of his sorrow and whether he saw an ill omen for his son. To this the Rishi replied that he saw nothing harmful for the child. He rejoiced because the Bodhisattva would achieve full enlightenment and become a great Buddha; and he grieved because his own life was short and he would not live to hear the great Doctrine preached.

Queen Māyā, after giving birth to the great Bodhisattva, departed her life and her sister Prajāpatī took the child and reared it. In Buddhist history, she is known as Buddha's first female disciple and the foundress and Head of a Samgha for Bhikshunīs.

On the fifth day, one hundred and eight Brahmins, versed in the Vedas, were invited by King Cuddhodana to his palace. They were to give a name to the newborn Prince and read his destiny by the position of the Luminaries. Eight of the most learned said: "He who has such signs as the Prince will become either a Universal Monarch, Chakravartin, or, if he retires from the world, will become a Buddha and remove the veil of ignorance from the sight of the world.”

The eighth, the youngest, added, “The Prince will leave the world after seeing four signs: an old man, a sick man, a corpse and an anchorite.”

The King, desiring to retain his son and heir, took all measures and precautions to assure this. He surrounded the Prince with all the luxuries and pleasures which his royal power could afford. There are many facts indicating that the Prince Siddhartha received a brilliant education, since knowledge as such was in great esteem in those days, and according to a remark in “Buddhacarita” by Açvaghosha, the city of Kapilavastu received its name in honor of the great Kapila—the founder of Sãmkhya philosophy.

Echoes of this philosophy can be found in the Teaching of the Blessed One.

For greater conviction, in the Canon the narrative about His luxurious life at the court of Çuddhodana is put in the words of Buddha Himself.

“I was tenderly cared for, bhikshus, supremely so, infinitely so. At my father’s palace, lotus pools were built for me, in one place for blue lotus flowers, in one place for white lotus flowers and in one place for red lotus flowers, blossoming for my sake. And, bhikshus, I used only sandal oil from Benares. Of Benares fabric were my three robes. Day and night a white umbrella was held over me, so that I might not be troubled by cold, heat, dust, chaff or dew. I dwelt in three palaces, bhikshus; in one, during the cold; in one, in the summer; and in one, during the rainy season. While in the palace of the rainy season, surrounded by musicians, singers and female dancers, for four months I did not descend from the palace. And, bhikshus, although in the domains of others only a dish of red rice and rice-soup would be offered to the servants and slaves, in my father’s house not only rice, but a dish with rice and meat was given to the servants and slaves.” (Anguttara-Nikåya, v. I., p. 145.)
But this luxurious and happy life could not appease the great spirit. And in the most ancient traditions we see that the awakening of consciousness to the sufferings and misery of men and to the problems of existence, occurred much earlier than is stated in later writings.

Thus the same Anguttara-Nikāya, seemingly in Buddha's own words, quotes, "Endowed with such wealth, reared in such delicacy, the thought came—'Verily, the unenlightened worldling, subject himself to old age, without escape from old age, is oppressed when he sees another grown old. I, too, am subject to old age and cannot escape it. If I, who am subject to all this, should see another one, who is grown old, oppressed, tormented and sickened, it would not be well with me.' (The same is repeated of sickness and death.) Thus as I reflected on it, all elation in youth utterly disappeared."

From His earliest childhood the Bodhisattva exhibited an unusual compassion and keen mind towards surrounding conditions. According to the Mahāvastu, the Bodhisattva was taken to the park by the King and His attendants. In this version He was old enough to walk about, and came to a rural village where He saw a serpent and a frog turned up by the plough. The frog was taken away for food and the serpent thrown away. This roused the Bodhisattva to great distress. He was filled with deep sorrow; He felt extreme compassion. Then, desiring complete solitude for His thoughts, He went to a rose-apple tree in an isolated spot; there, seated on the ground, covered with leaves, He fell into thought. His father, not seeing Him, became anxious. He was found by one of the courtiers under the shade of the rose-apple tree, deeply engrossed in thought.

Another time He saw the laborers, with hair unkempt, with bare hands and feet, their bodies grimy and bathed with sweat; and the work-oxen goaded with iron prods, their backs and rumps streaming blood, gasping, with fast-beating hearts, burdened by their yokes, bitten by flies and insects, gashed by the ploughshare, with bleeding and festered wounds. His tender heart was touched with compassion.
"To whom do you belong?" he asked the ploughmen.

"We are the King's property," they answered.

"From today you are no longer slaves, you shall no longer be servants. Go where'er you please and live in joy."

He freed also the oxen and said to them, "Go, from today eat the sweetest grass and drink the purest water and may the breezes from the four hemispheres visit you." Then seeing a shady jamboo tree, He sat at its foot and gave Himself to earnest meditation.

Devadatta, seeing a goose flying overhead, shot it and it fell in the garden of the Bodhisattva, who took it and drawing out the arrow, bound up its wound. Devadatta sent a messenger to claim the bird, but the Bodhisattva refused to relinquish it, saying that it belonged not to him who had attempted to take its life, but to him who had saved it. (D. f. 474.)

When the Prince reached His sixteenth birthday, in conformity with the customs of His country, He had to choose a consort, after proving himself victor of the Svayamvara contest of various war-feats. The chosen one was the Princess Yaçodhara of the same Çākya clan. She became mother of Rāhula, who later became his father's disciple and attained Arhatship.

But personal happiness, great as it was, could not satisfy the ardently striving spirit of the Bodhisattva. His heart continued to respond to each human sorrow and his mind, perceiving the transitoriness of all that existed, knew no rest. He roamed through the halls of His palace like a lion stung by some poisoned dart and in pain He groaned, "The world is full of darkness and ignorance; there is none who knows to cure the ills of existence!"

This state of His spirit is symbolically described in the four preordained encounters, after which He left His kingdom seeking to deliver the world of its misery. In an ancient biography in verse, following the third encounter, there is the remark that only the Bodhisattva and His charioteer saw the corpse carried across the road. According to Mahāparanirvāna Sutra the Prince was then completing his twenty-ninth year.

One day the Prince told Chandaka, His charioteer, that He wanted to drive in the park. While there He saw an old man, and the charioteer explained what old age was and how all were subject to it. Deeply impressed, the Prince turned back and returned home.

A short time after, while out driving, He met a sick man gasping for breath, his body disfigured, convulsed and groaning with pain, and His charioteer told Him what disease was and how all men were subject to it. And again He turned back. All pleasures appeared faded to Him and the joys of life became loathsome.

Another time, He came upon a procession with lighted torches bearing a litter with something wrapped in a linen sheet; the women accompanying it had dishevelled hair and were weeping piteously — it was a corpse and Chandaka told Him all must come to this state. And the Prince exclaimed: "O worldly men! How fatal is your delusion! Inevitably your body will crumble to dust, yet carelessly, unheedingly you live on." The charioteer, observing the deep impression these sights had made on the Prince, turned his horses and drove back to the city.

Then another incident happened to the Prince, which seemed to indicate to Him the solution of His quest. When they passed by the palaces of nobility, a Çakya Princess saw the Prince from the balcony of her palace and greeted Him with a stanza wherein the word "Nibutta" recurred in each line, which means:

"Happy the father that begot you,
"Happy the mother that nursed you.
"Happy the wife who calls you husband
"This, Lord, so glorious,
"She has gone beyond sorrow."

The Prince, hearing the word "Nibutta" (Nirvāṇa), loosened from His neck a precious pearl necklace and sent it to the princess as a reward for the instruction she had given to Him. He thought:

"Happy are they that have found deliverance.
Longing for peace of mind I shall seek the bliss of Nirvāṇa."

On the same night Yaṣodhara dreamt that the Prince was abandoning her and she awoke and told Him of her dream. "O, my Lord, where'er thou goest, there let me also go too."

And He, thinking of going where there was no sorrow (Nirvāṇa), replied: "So be it, wherever I go, there mayest thou go also."

After Buddha's return, Yaḍodhara, together with His foster mother Prajāpatī, became His first female disciple.

It was night. The Prince could not find peace on His couch. He arose and went forth into the garden. He sat down beneath the great jamboo tree and gave Himself to thought, pondering on life, on death and the evils of decay. He concentrated His mind, became free from confusion, and perfect tranquillity came upon Him. In this state His mental eye opened and He beheld a lofty figure endowed with majesty; calm and dignified. "Whence dost Thou come and Who art Thou?" asked the Prince. In reply the vision said: "I am a Čramana; troubled at the thought of old age, disease and death, I have left my home to seek the path of salvation. All things hasten to decay, only the truth abides forever. Everything changes and there is no permanency, yet the words of the Buddhas are immutable."

Siddhārtha asked: "Can peace be gained in this world of sorrow? I am overcome with the emptiness of pleasure and have become disgusted with lust. All oppresses me, and existence itself seems intolerable."

The Čramana replied: "Where heat is, there is also a possibility of cold. Creatures subject to pain possess the faculty of pleasure. The origin of evil indicates that good can be developed. For these things are correlatives. Thus where there is much suffering, there will be much bliss, if thou but openest thy eyes to find it. Just as a man, who has fallen into a heap of filth, should seek the nearby pond covered with lotuses; even so seek thou the great deathless lake of Nirvāṇa to cleanse the defilement of sin. If the lake is not sought, it is not the fault of the lake; even so, when there is a blessed road leading the man bound by sin to the salvation of Nirvāṇa, it is not the fault of the road, but of the man, if the road be not trod. And when a man burdened with sickness does not avail himself of the help of a physician who can heal him, it is not the fault of the physician; even so, when a man oppressed by the malady of wrong-doing does not seek the spiritual guide of Enlightenment, it is not the fault of the sin-destroying guide.”

The Prince listened to the wise words and said: “I know that my purpose will be accomplished but my father tells me that I am still too young, that my pulse beats too full to lead a Āramana’s life.”

The venerable figure replied: “Thou shouldst know that for seeking truth there can never be an inopportune time.”

A thrill of joy pierced Siddhārtha’s heart. “Now is the time to seek the truth. Now is the time to sever all ties that would prevent me from attaining perfect enlightenment.”

The celestial messenger heard the resolution of Siddhārtha with approval: “Go forth, Siddhārtha, and fulfill thy purpose. For thou art Bodhisattva, the Buddha elect; thou art destined to enlighten the world. Thou art Tathāgatha, the Perfect One, for thou shalt fulfill all righteousness and be Dharma-rāja, the King of Truth. Thou art Bhagavant, the Blessed One, for thou art summoned to become the Saviour and redeemer of the World.

“Do thou fulfill the perfection of Truth. Though the thunderbolt descend upon thy head, never yield to the allurements that beguile men from the path of truth. As the sun at all seasons pursues its own course nor seeks another, even so if thou forsakest not the straight path of righteousness, thou shalt become a Buddha.

“Persevere in thy quest and thou shalt find that which thou seekest. Pursue thy aim unswervingly and thou shalt conquer. The benediction of all deities, of all that seek light, is upon thee; and heavenly wisdom guides thy steps. Thou shalt be the Buddha, thou wilt enlighten the world and save mankind from perdition.”

Having thus spoken, the vision vanished and Siddhārtha’s soul was filled with ecstasy. He said to himself: “I have awakened to the Truth and I am resolved to accomplish my purpose. I will sever all ties that bind me to the world and I will set out from my home to seek the way of salvation. Verily, I shall become a Buddha.” (B. St. Jātaka Tales.)
The Prince returned to the palace for a last glance of farewell upon those whom He loved above all treasures of the earth. He went to the abode of the mother of Râhula and opened the door of Yaçodhara’s chamber. There burnt a lamp of scented oil. On the bed, strewn with jasmine, slept Yaçodhara, the mother of Râhula, with her hand on the head of her son. Standing with His foot at the threshold, the Bodhisattva looked at them and his heart grieved. The pain of parting smote Him. But nothing could shake His resolution and with a courageous heart He suppressed His feelings and tore Himself away. He mounted his steed Kanthaka and finding the castle gates wide open, He passed out into the silent night accompanied only by Chandaka, His faithful charioteer. Thus Siddhârtha, the Prince, renounced worldly pleasures, resigned His kingdom, severed all ties and went into homelessness. (B. St. Jâtaka Tales, pp. 5-6.)
Up to now, four sites in India have drawn the pilgrimages of devotees to the Teaching of the Blessed Buddha. His birthplace, Kapilavastu, was a city situated in the north of India, on the foothills of the Himalayas, at the source of the river Gandak, and was destroyed even during the life of Buddha. The place of His enlightenment, Bodhigāya, where was Uruvelā the grove, often mentioned, under the shade of which Gotama united all His attainments in illumination. The place of His first sermon, Sarnāth (near Benares), where, according to the legend, Buddha set in motion the wheel of the Law, and which up to now shows traces of ruins of most ancient communities. The place of His death—Kushinagara (Nepal).

In the notes of the Chinese traveler Fa-hsien (392-414), who visited India, we find a description of the domain of Kapilavastu as well as of other revered spots.

Despite these facts, despite the ancient columns of King Açoka, there are those who love to make of the Buddha a myth, and to separate this high Teacher-
To the first, He said: “If one could attain perfection and liberation from the bonds which tie man to the earth only through the renunciation of food and human conditions, then a horse or a cow would have reached it long since.”

To the second, “According to his deeds a man becomes a pariah; according to deeds he becomes a Brahmin. The fire kindled by a Brahmin, and the fire kindled by a Čudra have an equal flame, brightness and light. To what has your isolation brought you? In order to procure bread you go to the general market, and you value the coins from the purse of a Čudra. Your isolation may be termed merely plunder. And your sacred implements are merely instruments of deception.

“Are not the possessions of the rich Brahmin a desecration of the Divine Law? You consider the south as light and the north as darkness. A time will come when I shall come from the midnight and your light shall be extinguished. Even the birds fly north to bear their young. Even the gray geese know the value of earthly possession. But the Brahmin tries to fill his girdle with gold and to hoard his treasures under the threshold of his house. Brahmin, you lead a contemptible life and your end shall be pitiable. You shall be the first to be visited with destruction. If I go northward, then shall I also return from there.” (Taken from oral traditions of Buddhists in India.)

There are established cases when, after His discourses, a great many of the listeners deserted Him and the Blessed One said: “The seed has separated from the husk; the remaining community, strong in conviction, is established. It is well that the conceited ones have departed.”

Let us remember the episode when His nearest disciple and relative, Devadatta, conceived the thought of throwing a stone at the passing Teacher and even succeeded in injuring His toe.

Let us remember the cruel destiny which visited His clan and country through the vengeance of the neighboring King. The legends relate that Buddha, being far from the city with His beloved disciple Ananda at the time of the attack on His country, felt a severe headache and lay down on the ground, covering Himself with his robe, in order to hide from the only witness, the sorrow which overcame His stoical heart.

Neither was He exempt from physical ailments. Severe pains in His back are often mentioned and even His death was the result of poisoned food. All these details make His image verily human and close to us.

The word “Buddha” is not a name but indicates the state of a mind which has reached the highest point of development; literally translated, it means the “enlightened one,” or the one who possesses perfect knowledge and wisdom.

According to Pāli Suttas, Buddha never claimed the omniscience which was attributed to Him by His disciples and followers: “Those who told thee, Vachcha, that the Teacher Gotama knows all, sees all, and asserts His possession of limitless powers of foresight and knowledge and says ‘In motion or immobility, in vigilance or sleep, always and in all omniscience dwells in me,’ those people do not say what I said, they accuse me despite all truth.” (Majjhima Nikāya, vol. 1, p. 482.)

The powers possessed by Buddha are not miraculous, because a miracle is a violation of the laws of nature. The supreme power of Buddha coördinates completely with the eternal order of things. His superhuman abilities are miraculous, inasmuch as the activities of a man must appear miraculous to the lower beings. To self-sacrificing heroes, to fighters for true knowledge, it is as natural to manifest their unusual achievements as for a bird to fly or for a fish to swim.

Buddha, according to a text, “is only the elder of men, differing from them no more than as the hatched chick differs from later chicks of the same hen.” Knowledge uplifted Him to a different order of beings, because the principle of differentiation lies in the depth of consciousness.

The humanness of Gotama Buddha is especially underlined in the most ancient writings, where the following expression is met: “Gotama Buddha, the most perfect of bipeds.”

The Pāli Suttas contain many vivid definitions of the high qualities of Gotama, the Teacher, Who indicated the path. Let us mention some of them: “He is the leader of the caravan, the founder, the teacher, the incomparable trainer of men. Humanity was rolling as a cartwheel on the way to its destruction, lost without guide and protector. He indicated to it the right path.”—“He is the Lord of the wheel of Benevolent Law. He is the Lion of the Law.” (Cikṣāsamuccaya, p. 320.)

“He is a wondrous doctor; by compassionate means He cures dangerously sick people.” (Bodhicaryāvatāra, 7-24.)

“The venerable Gotama is a ploughman. His field is immortality.” (Sutta Nipāta, v. 80.)

“He is the light of the world. He it is Who lifts one from the earth. He it is Who unveils that which is concealed. He it is Who carries the torch in the darkness, in order that those who have eyes may see; thus Gotama illumined His Teaching from all sides.”

“He is the Liberator. He liberates, because He Himself has been liberated.” His moral and spiritual perfections testify to the Truth of His Teaching and the power of His influence upon those who surrounded Him rested on the example of His personal labour.

Ancient writings always emphasize the vital applicability of His Teaching. Gotama did not avoid life, but took part in the daily life of the workers. He tried to direct them toward the Teaching, offered them participation in His communities, accepted their invitations and did not fear to visit courtesans and rajahs, the two centers of social life in the cities of India. He tried not to offend unnecessarily the traditional customs; furthermore He sought the possibility of giving them His Teaching, finding support for it in an especially revered tradition, not conflicting with the basic principles.

There was no abstraction in His Teaching. He never opposed the ideal of mystic and transcendental life to existing reality. He stressed the reality of all existing things and conditions for the current moment. And as His activities and thoughts were concerned mostly with the circumstances of life, He drew the contents of His speeches and parables out of daily life, using the simplest images and comparisons.

Starting from the concept of the parallel between nature and human life, Hindu thinkers believe that the manifestations of nature can explain many things to us in the manifestations of life. Using this method, Buddha, fortunately for His doctrine, retained the experience of this old tradition. "I shall show thee by comparison, because many rational people understood by comparison"—such was the usual formula of Buddha. And His simple, vital approach lent to His Teaching vividness and conviction.

His influence upon people was proportionate to His faith in Himself, in His power, and in His mission. He always adapted Himself to the circumstance of each pupil and listener, giving to them the most needed, in accordance with their understanding. He did not burden the disciples and listeners who were unprepared to absorb the highest knowledge, with intricate intellectual processes. Nor did He encourage those who sought abstract knowledge, without applying in life His highly ethical Teaching. Once, when one such questioner, named Māluṅkya, asked the Blessed One about the origin of all things—the Blessed One remained silent, because He considered the most important task lay in affirmation of the reality of our surroundings; this meant, to see things as they exist around us, and try first to perfect them, to prompt their evolution and not to waste time on intellectual speculation.

Certainly His knowledge was not limited to His Doctrine, but caution prompted by great wisdom made Him hesitant to divulge conceptions which, if misunderstood, might be disastrous.

"One day the Blessed One was staying at Kosambi in a sinsapa grove. And the Blessed One, taking a few sinsapa leaves in His hand, said to His disciples, ‘What think you, my disciples, what is more, these few leaves I hold in my hand, or the remaining leaves in the sinsapa grove above?’

‘The leaves that the Blessed One holds in His hands are few in number; far more are the leaves in the sinsapa grove above.’

‘Even so, disciples, what I have perceived and not communicated to you is far more than what I have communicated to you. And why, O disciples, have I not revealed this to you? Because it would be of no advantage to you, because it does not contribute to the higher life, because it does not lead to disgust with the world, to annihilation of all lust, to the ceasing of the transitory, to peace, to higher knowledge, to awakening, to Nirvāṇa. Therefore I have not communicated it to you. And what have I communicated to you? That which is suffering, the source of suffering, the cessation of suffering and the path that leads to the cessation of suffering.’"

And so individual and practical was His Teaching in each separate case, that the tradition of three circles of the Teaching was established: for the chosen ones, for the members of the Samgha and for all.

Founding His Samghas, Buddha strove to create the best conditions for those who had firmly determined to work upon the expansion of their consciousness for the attainment of higher knowledge. Then He sent them into life as teachers of life, as heralds of a world community.

The constant discipline of words, thoughts and deeds, demanded of His disciples and without which there can be no success on the way to perfection, is almost unattainable for those in the midst of the usual conditions of life, where a thousand outer circumstances and petty obligations constantly divert the striving one from his aim. But life among people united by the same aspiration, by distinct thoughts and habits, was a great aid, because it provided possibilities without loss of energy to develop in the desired direction.

Buddha—Who taught that in the whole Universe only correlatives exist; Who knew that nothing exists without coöperation; Who understood that the selfish and conceited one could not build the future because, by the cosmic law, he would be outside the current of life which carries the all existing towards perfection—patiently planted the seeds, establishing the cells of a community basis, foreseeing in the distant future the realisation of the great World Community.

Two rules were necessary for admission into the community: Complete renunciation of personal possession, and moral purity. The other rules were concerned with the severe self-discipline and obligations to the community. Each one entering the community pronounced the formula: “I take refuge in Buddha, I take refuge in the Teaching, I take refuge in the Samgha, as the destroyers of my fear. The first with His Teachings, the second by its immutable truth, and the third by its example of the great law expounded by Buddha.”

The renunciation of property was austerely carried into life. Besides, the renunciation of property had to be shown not so much externally as accepted in consciousness.

Once a pupil asked the Blessed One, “How should one understand the fulfillment of the Covenant regarding the renunciation of property? One disciple renounced all things but his Teacher continued to reproach him for possession. Another remained surrounded by objects but did not merit reproach.”

“The feeling of possession is measured not by objects but by thoughts. One may have objects and still not be a possessor.”

Buddha always advised the possession of as few objects as possible in order not to devote too much time to them.

The entire life of the community was strictly disciplined, as the foundation of Buddha’s Teaching was iron self-discipline, in order to bridle uncontrolled feelings and thoughts and to develop indomitable will. Only when the disciple mastered his senses did the Teacher slightly raise the veil and assign a task. Only thereafter was the pupil admitted to the depth of knowledge. Out of such men, disciplined and trained by austere renunciation of everything personal, and consequently virile and fearless, did Gotama Buddha desire to create workers for the common welfare, creators of the people’s consciousness and forerunners of the world community.

Valor was cemented into the foundation of all achievements in the Teaching of Gotama. “There is no true compassion without valor; no self-discipline may be achieved without valor; patience is valor; one cannot fathom the depth of true knowledge and acquire the wisdom of an Arhat without valor.” Gotama demanded from His disciples complete annihilation of any sense of fear. Fearlessness of thought, fearlessness of action were ordained. The very name of Buddha Gotama, “Lion,” and His personal summons to walk through all obstacles like a rhinoceros or elephant, shows what depths of fearlessness He ordained. Hence, the Teaching of Gotama may first of all be called the Teaching of Fearlessness.

According to tradition, the attainment of illumination by Gotama was marked by the revelation of “the chains of causation” (12 Nidānas). The problem which tormented Him for many years was solved. Meditating from cause to effect, Gotama revealed the source of evil:

12) Existence is pain, because it contains old age, death and myriads of pains. 11) I suffer because I am born. 10) I am born because I belong to the world of existence. 9) I exist because I nourish existence within me. 8) I nurture existence because I have desires. 7) I have desires because I have sensations. 6) I have sensations because I come in touch with the outer world. 5) This touch is produced by the action of my six senses. 4) My senses are manifested because being a personality I oppose myself to the impersonal. 3) I am a personality because I have a consciousness imbued with the consciousness of this personality. 2) This consciousness was created as a consequence of my former existences. 1) These existences obscured my consciousness because I did not know.

Thus the source and the primary cause of all human sufferings lie in obscurity and ignorance. From this, issue Gotama’s definitions and condemnations precisely of ignorance. He affirmed that ignorance is the greatest crime because it is the cause of all human sufferings, compelling us to value that which is unworthy of being valued; to suffer there, where there should be no suffering; to take the illusion for the reality; to spend one’s life pursuing the insignificant, neglecting what in reality is the most precious: knowledge of the mystery of human existence and destiny.

The light which could dispel this darkness and give liberation from suffering, was proclaimed by Gotama Buddha as the knowledge of the four Noble Truths:

1) The pain of embodied existence, caused by constantly recurring births and deaths.

2) The cause of these sufferings lies in ignorance, in the thirst for self-gratification through earthly possessions which drag after them the perpetual repetition of imperfect existence.

3) The cessation of sufferings lies in the attainment of a state of enlightened all-inclusiveness, thus creating the possibility of conscious interception of the circle of earthly existence.

4) The path to cessation of these pains consists in gradual strengthening of the elements necessary to be perfected for the annihilation of the causes of earthly existence and for approaching the great truth.

The path to this truth was divided by Gotama into eight parts: 1) Right understanding (that which concerns the law of causes). 2) Right thinking. 3) Right speech. 4) Right action. 5) Right living. 6) Right labour. 7) Right vigilance and self-discipline. 8) Right concentration.

Man, who has applied these points to life, is freed from the pain of earthly existence which is the consequence of ignorance, desire and longings. When this liberation is achieved, Nirvana is attained.

What is Nirvana? "Nirvana is the capacity to contain all actions, is the limit of all-inclusiveness. The tremor of illumination attracts true knowledge. Quiescence is only an outer sign, not expressing the essence of this state."

Gotama Buddha also pointed out ten great obstacles, called fetters: 1) The illusion of personality. 2) Doubt. 3) Superstition. 4) Physical passions. 5) Hatred. 6) Attachment to earth. 7) Desire of enjoyment and rest. 8) Pride. 9) Self-contentment. 10) Ignorance. To reach the higher knowledge, it is necessary to shake off these fetters.

In Buddhism, are expounded, to the minutest details, the subdivisions of senses, motives of the intellectual process as obstacles or means of development for the facilitation of self-knowledge through mental training and analysing each object in detail. Following this method of self-knowledge, man ultimately reaches the knowledge of true reality, sees truth as it is. This is the method applied by each wise teacher for the development of the disciple's mind.

Preaching the four Noble Truths and the noble path, Gotama condemned, on one hand, the bodily mortification practised by ascetics, and, on the other, licentiousness—indicating the path of the eight steps as the way of the harmonisation of senses and the attainment of the six perfections of an Arhat: compassion, morality, patience, virility, concentration and wisdom.

Buddha insisted upon the realization by his disciples of the conception of the two extremes. The realization of this conception was facilitated by the assimilation of the principle of relativity. Buddha affirmed the relativity of all existing, pointing out the eternal changes in nature and the impermanency of all things in the stream of boundless existence eternally striving towards perfection. And the extent to which He adhered to this principle of relativity may be seen from the following parable:

"Suppose," said the Buddha to His followers one day, "suppose that a man, setting upon a long journey, is confronted by a great body of water, the nearer side of which is beset with many perils and dangers, but the farther side, secure and free of danger; that there is no boat wherewith to cross the flood, nor any bridge leading to the other shore. And suppose this man should say to himself, 'Truly, this is a great and wide body of water, but means wherewith to get to the other shore there are none. Suppose I gather reeds and twigs and leaves and from them make a raft for myself, and supported on my raft and paddling with hands and feet cross to the safety of the other shore!' Then suppose this man does as he has said and makes a raft, launches it upon the water and, working hands and feet, arrives safely on the other shore.

"And now, after crossing and reaching the opposite shore, suppose the man should say, 'Verily, serviceable indeed has this raft been to me, for by means of it, working hands and feet, I have safely crossed to this other shore. Suppose I lift up my raft and put it on my head or shoulders and so proceed upon my way!'

"What think ye, disciples?—By so doing, would the man be acting rightly regarding his raft?

"What then ought such a man do to act rightly regarding his raft?

"Then, disciples, ought this man to say to himself, 'Truly, this raft has been very serviceable to me, for supported by this raft and working hands and feet, I have crossed safely to this farther shore. But suppose I lay it on the bank and proceed with my journey!' Thus, this man would be acting rightly in the matter of his raft.

"In the same manner also, disciples, do I put My Teaching before you in the analogy of a raft, designed as a means of escape, not a constant possession. Understand clearly this analogy of a raft: Dhamma is to be left behind when you cross to the shore of Nirvāṇa."

Here we see what little importance is to be attached to anything in this world of relativity—Māyā. Everything, even the Teaching of a perfectly Enlightened One, is of merely provisory, transitory, relative value. This parable also stresses the necessity of exertion through human hands and feet, the Teaching being effective only if personal efforts are applied to it.
The communities of Buddha gave shelter to the most varied demands and therefore were gathered out of the most varied elements. In “Milinda Panha,” we find the following lines: “‘What causes impel one to join the community?’ Milinda once asked his Buddhist teacher Nāgasena. The sage answered: ‘Some become adherents of the Samgha in order to escape the tyranny of a ruler; others join to save themselves from brigands or are overburdened with debts, but there are also some who simply wish to have their existence provided for.’”

If some joined the community in search of social and material privileges, more numerous were the true social reformers, gathered under the broad shelter of possibilities, which the Teaching of Buddha offered, in the midst of the dark feudal reality of His era. In “Sutta Nipāta” one may find severe condemnations of the social stamina and public morality of that era.

The community admitted all without distinction of race, caste or sex, and the most varying quests and searchings of new ways found satisfaction in it.

Buddha’s communities were not monasteries, and admission to them was not an initiation. According to the words of the Teacher, the realisation of the Teaching alone made of the neophyte a new man and a member of the community.

Full equality of all members existed in the community. One member differed from another, by the date of his admission. At the election of the elder, age was not taken into consideration. Seniority was not measured by gray hair. About one whose merit rested only on his old age, it was said that he was old in vain. But “he is the Elder in whom justice speaks, who knows how to master himself, who is wise.” (Dhammapada, p. 260.)

Buddha did not demand living in a closed community. From the very beginning, among the disciples there were some who preferred the solitary life. About those who isolated themselves too greatly, Buddha said: “A solitary life in the forests is useful to him who pursues it, but of little help to the welfare of men.”

Buddha did not wish to establish too many rules. He strove to avoid pedantry and uniformity of regulations, as well as the imposition of too many prohibitions. All rules were directed towards protecting and safeguarding the complete independence of the disciple. The member of the community was obliged to observe simplicity and decency, but as there lie no spiritual preferences in how to be nourished and how to dress, Buddha left a certain freedom to the disciples. Incited by Devadatta, some of the disciples asked Buddha to establish a more strict discipline for the community and to forbid the use of meat and fish. Buddha refused their request, saying that each one was free to apply to himself these measures but they should not be imposed as an obligation for all. The same tolerance was permitted in attire, as it was inadmissible that freedom should degenerate into a privilege for the few. Confident of the wisdom of the venerable Sona, the Blessed One said to him: "Sona, thou hast been raised in refinement, I command thee to wear shoes with soles." Sona then asked that this permission be extended to all members of the Samgha and the Blessed One quickly acceded to this request. (Mahāvagga, p. 185.)

In the Vinaya text we see how all regulations in the community established by the Blessed One were always instigated by a vital necessity. In the Vinaya texts II, page 240, a touching episode which resulted in a new rule for the Samgha is cited.

One time a certain bhikshu had an illness of the bowels and he lay fallen in his own excrements. Now, when the Blessed One, followed by the venerable Ananda passed through the sleeping quarters, He came to the cell of the bhikshu and saw him in this condition.

And seeing, He went to him and said, "What is it, bhikshu, are you ill?"
"I have an illness of the bowels, Lord."
"Have you no one to attend upon you, bhikshu?"
"No, Lord."
"Why do not the bhikshus wait upon you?"
"Because, Lord, I am of no service to the bhikshus."

Whereupon the Blessed One said to the venerable Ananda, "Go, Ananda, and bring water, let us bathe this bhikshu."

"Yes, Lord," replied the venerable Ananda to the Blessed One, and brought the water. Then the Blessed One poured the water while the venerable Ananda washed him. And the Blessed One holding him by the head, and the venerable Ananda by the feet they lifted him and laid him upon his bed.

Then on that occasion and in that connection, the Blessed One called a meeting of the Order and asked the bhikshus, "Bhikshus, in such a quarter is there a bhikshu who is sick?"

"Yes, Lord."

"And, bhikshus, what is the matter with him?"

"He has an illness of the bowels, Lord."

"And is there no one to wait upon him, bhikshus?"

"No, Lord."

"But why do not the bhikshus wait upon him?
Bhikshus, you have neither mothers nor fathers who may wait upon you. If, bhikshus, you do not wait upon one another, who, forsooth, will wait upon you?
Whosoever, bhikshus, would wait upon Me should wait upon the sick.

"If he have a preceptor, his preceptor should wait upon him until he is recovered and the same if he have a teacher, a co-disciple of the same Vihāra, or a disciple lodging with his teacher. And if he have none of these, then the Samgha should wait upon him;

and whosoever does not do so, shall be guilty of offense."

The Teacher's dislike to establish numerous and static rules, especially forbiddances, and the desire to safeguard the vitality of the communal life are vividly expressed in His last covenants to His disciple Ananda, "I entrust the community to alter the small and minutest rules."

But many weak souls are more at ease if their obligations are strictly defined; hence, originated the multiplicity of rules and forbiddances of later Buddhism. It is much easier to submit to rules, even under constraint, than to manifest the personal conscious energy which the Teacher demanded of His disciples.
The community strove not to deprive the members of their personalities, but to unite them in friendship and intimacy in a single aspiration towards general well-being. The community did not desire to level individual peculiarities; on the contrary, Buddha appreciated each evidence of initiative, each individual manifestation, because the Teaching asserts that each one is his own creator and liberator, and that personal efforts are absolutely necessary to achieve this high goal. Thus the individual origin had all possibilities for development. “Avoid quarrels, affirming in one’s own self, not excluding others.” This was accepted as a rule in the community.

And so little did Buddhism fear individual manifestations, that often the inspired words of one of the members of the community were accepted and became part of the Canon together with the covenants of the Teacher.

Severe discipline, constant watch over thought, word and deed, made out of the community a school, as much a training one as educational. The Teacher, Who pronounced knowledge the one means of escape from earthly fetters and ignorance, the most heinous crime, ordained all to walk the path of knowledge.

Parallel with the condemnation of ignorance we find an equally stern condemnation of frivolity.

“The foolish, the ignorant, are their own greatest enemies, for they do evil deeds, which bear bitter fruits.

“Though a fool be companion to a wise man his whole life long, he yet remains ignorant of the Truth, as the spoon of the savour of the soup.

“Long is the night to the watcher, long is the mile to the weary. Long is the round of lives and deaths to fools that know not the Truth.” (Dhammapada.)

Especially often He pointed out to parents to teach their children all sciences and arts and thereby to help the growth of their consciousness. He likewise constantly pointed out the vital necessity of travel. Therein He saw a really instructive purpose, as travel, tearing man away from daily circumstances, develops in him mobility, resourcefulness and adaptability—indispensable qualities preparatory to the process of expansion of consciousness.

The Teaching of Gotama demands authenticity, but it has no dogmas which are to be taken on good faith, because the Teacher, affirming knowledge in all things, saw no use in blind faith for the development of consciousness. “Therefore,” said Buddha, “I have taught you to believe not only because you have heard, but only when your consciousness has verified and accepted.”

In a talk with a young brahmin, Buddha pointed out how a worthy disciple attains a mastery of the truth: “When, after a mature consideration, the disciple acknowledges that the indicated man is entirely free from possibility of error, he trusts this man. Approaching him with trust, he becomes his disciple. Having become his disciple, he opens his ear. Having opened his ear, he hearkens to the Teaching. Having heard the Teaching, he retains it in his mind. He analyzes the meaning of the truths that he has retained. He meditates upon it. From this is born his decisiveness. What he has decided he will undertake. He appreciates the significance of the undertaken. Having appreciated, he applies all efforts. By applied efforts he approaches the truth. Having penetrated into its depths, he sees. But all this is only the recognition of the truth, but not its possession. In order to master it completely, one has to apply, to nurture and untiringly to reiterate this psychological process."

(Majjhima Nikāya, v. 2, p. 173.)

From this discourse it is clear how free the disciple was to discuss the Teaching given to him, and that knowledge and mastery of the truth are attained only by self-exertion.

The Teaching of Buddha, as a Teaching of Truth, embraced all the preceding great teachings and therefore, stressing their truth, it rejected denial. Rejecting denial the Teaching did not subordinate any one. The realisation of the great principle of cooperation opened all ways.

In the communities of Buddha, a personally realised renunciation was permitted, but a denial was compared to ignorance. In the communities of Buddha one could renounce petty considerations, but a denial was equal to a withdrawal from the community. It was customary never to mention the one who left—the community had to live for the future. Besides, the departed one often returned; then the return was never followed by any questions besides: "Dost thou not deny?"

At the beginning of the Teaching, the discipline chiefly concerned the purification of the heart and mind of all prejudices and bad qualities. According to the progress, the emphasis of the Teaching was transferred and concentrated upon the expansion of consciousness.
It is difficult for a man to rise without passing through the severe trial of purification. “If the cloth be dirty, however much the dyer might dip it into blue, yellow, red or lilac dye its color will be ugly and unclear—why? Because of the dirt in the cloth. If the heart is impure one must expect the same sad result.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 36.)

“I say that it is not sufficient to wear a robe, to be a striving one. It is not enough to be naked, covered with mud, sprinkled with water, to sit beneath a tree, to live in solitude, to stand in one position, to starve oneself, to repeat mantras and to twist one’s hair.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 281.) “A man is not a mendicant only because he is being fed through alms.” (Dhammapada, p. 226.) “A man is not an ascetic only because he lives in a forest. Unworthy of the yellow garment is he who wears it and is impure and insincere in deed, is ignorant and has not mastered himself.” (Cikṣūsamuccaya, p. 198.)

“Of the three kinds of action,” said Buddha, “the most heinous is not the word, not the physical act, but the thought.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 272.) From the moment of conception of an evil decision, man is already guilty, whether it be executed or no.

“The prime element in all is thought. Preponderant is thought, by thought all is made. If a man speak or act with evil thought, suffering follows him as the wheel follows the hoof of the beast that draws the cart.

“If a man speak or act with righteous thought, happiness follows him close as his never-absented shadow.” (Dhammapada.)

“Enemy works evil to enemy, hater to hater, but worse is the evil wrought by a wrongly directed mind.” (Dhammapada.)

The Teacher pointed out vigilance over one’s thoughts with especial insistence, because if the disciple, too confident of the results attained by him, would lessen his vigilance he would pay dearly for the slightest neglect. This advice was given in a parable: “A man was wounded with a poisoned arrow. The physician, having extracted the arrow, advised the wounded man to watch the wound most attentively. But the patient imagined he had nothing more to fear. Uncared for, the wound inflamed and caused death with acute pain.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 2, p. 256.)

"Vigilance is the road to immortality. Negligence is the road to death. Those that are vigilant do not die. Those that are negligent are as dead.

"To those that are inconstant in thought, ignorant of the true law, of wavering confidence, wisdom comes not to fullness.

"As a fletcher straightens his arrow, a wise man straightens his fickle and unsteady mind which is difficult to guard, difficult to guide.

"As rain leaks into an ill-thatched house, so craving leaks into an ill-trained mind.” (Dhammapada.)

"The great and small fetters of a bhikshu, who delights in vigilance and dreads negligence, are all burned away. He moves as fire.”

Indicating the madness, from the point of view of usefulness, of yielding to base inclinations, Buddha said: “The feeling for the sake of which you humiliated yourselves, will soon be only a memory to you, as a pleasure experienced in a dream. But that which remains as a constant living reproach is the deed performed for this pleasure.” (Bodhicaryāvatāra, v. 3, p. 37.)

"Morality is like an inflated leather bag, damage it once and it is destroyed. Likewise, succumb but once to vicious inclinations, and nothing can arrest the rush of passions. And a man left to himself will irrevocably perish.”

"Irrigators deflect water where they will; fletchers shape the arrow; carpenters turn the wood to their will; the wise bend themselves.” (Dhammapada.)

In the writings, we find no difference made between the members of the community—the social leaders, the married, celibates, men, women—all may receive equally the Truth taught to them.

Admission into the community was not followed by any vows. The one who came brought with him only a readiness to serve the Teaching. But when this readiness disappeared, nothing bound him to remain in the community. Leaving the community was as simple as admission. Numerous are the examples of those who left the community and returned later.

It is impossible to expel a member of the community merely because one does not agree with him in the appreciation of his deed. To expel him would mean to free the torrent of fiery words and disunion in the community. "A member of the community will not repeat what he has heard to disunite others, but will bring them closer, pronouncing only the words of peace. Never was hatred destroyed by hatred; goodness alone put an end to it; such is the eternal law." (Dhammapada, v. 165.)

"He abused me, he misused me, he overpowered me, he robbed me; in those who harbor such thoughts, anger is never stilled."

"If a man concern himself with the faults of others and is ever inclined to be offended, his own passions will grow and he is far from the destruction of passion."

"There are some who do not know the need of self-restraint; if they are quarrelsome, we may excuse their conduct. But those who know better should learn to live in concord."

"If a man find a wise friend who lives righteously and is constant in his character, he may live with him, overcoming all dangers, happy and mindful. But with fools there is no companionship. Rather than to live with men who are selfish, vain, argumentative and obstinate, let a man walk alone."

Influenced by goal-fitness in all things, Buddha did not strive to systematize His Teaching. He wished each point of the Teaching to affect as powerfully as possible the will of His disciple. Aiming only for the growth and development of consciousness, He permitted freedom of thought and action in all else. Buddha desired individual discipline for each one.

"How did Buddha elect disciples for achievement? During work, when fatigue already possessed the disciples, Buddha asked the most unexpected question, awaiting the promptest reply.

"Or placing the simplest object before them, He suggested that they describe it in not more than three words and not less than a hundred pages. Or placing a pupil before a sealed door, He asked: 'How will you open it?'

"Or ordering musicians to perform beneath the window, He made them sing hymns of entirely dissimilar contents.

"Or passing in front of the pupils, He would ask them how many times He had done so."
“Or noticing an annoying fly, He asked the pupil to repeat words unexpectedly pronounced.

“Or noticing a fear of animals or natural phenomena, He set His pupils the condition to master it.

“Thus the powerful Lion tempered the blade of the spirit.”

And one should not forget the favorite pastime of Buddha with His disciples, during moments of rest. The Teacher cast into space one word, on the basis of which the disciples built an entire thought. There is no wiser test of the condition of consciousness. (Written down from the oral teachings of Hindu Buddhism.)

Buddha, through true knowledge and firm realisation of the change of all that existed, tempered His pupils, arming them with courage, patience and compassion, training true warriors for the common welfare.

Especially numerous in the ancient writings are instances of complete contempt for that which makes life easy and conventionally pleasant.

The renunciation of all personal gives birth to the sense of true freedom; from freedom is born joy; from joy satisfaction; from satisfaction the sense of calmness and happiness.

Buddha found the way to the heart of people not through miracles but by practical teaching of the perfection of everyday life and by His personal example of great cooperation.

And so great was His tolerance and desire for close cooperation with people, that He never spoke against their rites or beliefs. In all cases he was unconcerned with outer forms and tried only to give a broader understanding of the inner meaning, explaining it from a new point of view.

“Once on His way, the Blessed One, while staying at the bamboo grove near Rājāgriha, met Srigāla, a householder, who clasping his hands, turned to the four quarters of the world, to the zenith above and to the nadir below. And the Blessed One knowing that this was done according to the traditional religious superstition to avert evil, asked Srigāla, ‘Why do you perform these strange ceremonies?’

“Srigāla said in reply, ‘Do you think it strange that I protect my home against the influence of demons? I know that thou, O Gotama Čākyamuni, whom people call the Tathāgata and the Blessed Buddha, wouldst tell me that incantations are of no avail and possess no saving power. But listen to me and know that in performing this rite I honor, reverence and keep sacred the words of my father.'

"Then the Tathāgata said, 'You do well, O Srīgāla, to honor, reverence and keep sacred the words of your father; and it is your duty to protect your home, your wife, your children and the children of your children against the baneful influences of evil spirits. I find no fault with the performance of your father's rite. But I find that you do not understand the ceremony. Let the Tathāgata, who is now speaking to you as a spiritual father and loves you not less than did your parents, explain to you the meaning of the six directions:

"'To guard your home by mysterious ceremonies is not sufficient; you must guard it by good deeds. Turn to your parents in the east, to your Teachers in the south, to your wife and children in the west, to your friends in the north, and regulate the zenith of your religious relations above you, and the nadir of your servants below you.

From the very beginning of His activity He was convinced that a word pronounced at the fitting time and in its proper place was more convincing than any miracle, in its psychic effect on man and his regeneration. He severely commanded His disciples not to manifest their acquired "miraculous" powers before those who were not acquainted with the principles they enfolded. Besides this, such manifestations are harmful for the possessor himself, exalting him above his surroundings and developing conceit in him.
An ordained disciple must not boast of superhuman perfection. The disciple who with evil intent and from covetousness boasts of a superhuman perfection, be it celestial visions or miracles, is no longer a disciple of the Čākyamuni. “I forbid you, O bhikshus, to employ any spells or supplications, for they are useless since the law of karma governs all things. He who attempts to perform miracles, has not understood the Doctrine of the Tathāgata.”

The word and power of conviction were the only weapons applied by the Teacher to influence people. Nowhere do we ever find anger or indignation, but only the austere affirmation of truth. “The Blessed One is perfect in the conduct of His speech” points out the disciple Čāriputra.

“Like the earth, patiently enduring without sorrow or pleasure all things cast upon it pure and impure, so does Buddha, untouched, endure reverence as well as the disdain of men. As water, purifying and refreshing all without distinction, though they be just or evil, Buddha gives His compassion to foes and friends.” (Jataka, v. 1, p. 23.)

Numerous are the visits and discourses of Buddha with His hearers on that which directly touched them, and the many-sided discussions of their obligations in relation to their families and social welfare. His distinction from other teachers and His greatest merit lie in the fact that, considering the duty of man from the point of view of vital usefulness, He tried to apply sensitive and uplifting feeling to the practical life.

This vital, practical side of the Teaching is beautifully expressed in the answer of the Blessed One to Anathapindika, a man of incalculable wealth, called “the supporter of the orphans and the friend of the poor,” who came to consult Him.

Hearing that Buddha was stopping in the bamboo grove near Rājagriha, Anathapindika set out in the very night to meet the Blessed One. And the Blessed One perceived at once the pure heart of Anathapindika and greeted him with words of comfort.

Anathapindika said, “I see that Thou art Buddha, the Blessed One, and I wish to open to Thee my whole mind. Having listened to my words advise me what I shall do. My life is full of work and having acquired great wealth, I am surrounded with care. Yet do I enjoy my work and I apply myself to it with all diligence. Many people are in my employ and depend upon the success of my enterprises.

“Now I have heard your disciples praise the bliss of the hermit and denounce the unrest of the world. ‘The Holy One,’ they say, ‘has given up His kingdom and His inheritance and has found the path of righteousness, thus setting an example to all the world how to attain Nirvāṇa.’

“My heart yearns to do what is right and to be a blessing to my fellow-beings. Let me then ask you, must I give up my wealth, my home and my business enterprises, and like Thee, choose homelessness in order to attain the bliss of the righteous life?”

And the Buddha replied, “The bliss of the righteous life is attainable by everyone who walks in the noble eight-fold paths. He that is attached to wealth had better cast it away than allow his heart to be poisoned by it; but he who does not cleave to wealth and who, possessing riches, uses them rightly, will be a blessing to his fellow-beings.

“I say to thee, remain in thy station of life and apply thyself with diligence to thy enterprises. It is not life and wealth and power that enslave men, but their attachment to life and wealth and power.

“The bhikshu who retires from the world to lead a life of leisure derives no profit. For a life of indolence is an abomination, and want of energy is to be despised. The Dharma of the Tathāgata does not require that a man choose homelessness or resign the world, unless he feels called upon to do so; but the Dharma of the Tathāgata requires each man to free himself from the illusion of self, to cleanse his heart, to give up his thirst for pleasure and to lead a life of righteousness.

“And whatever men do, whether they remain in the world as artisans, merchants and officers of the King, or retire from the world and devote themselves to a life of religious meditation, let them put their whole heart into their task, let them be diligent and energetic. And if they be as the lotus, which growing in water yet remains untouched by water, if they struggle in life without cherishing envy or hatred, if they live in the world a life, not of self but a life of truth, then surely joy, peace and bliss will dwell in their minds.”
In all things He was influenced by goal-fitness. "What privileges could heaven give you? You must be conquerors here in this world, in the conditions in which you are now." (Milinda-Panha, p. 393.)

Once a great disputer tried to embarrass Buddha by plying Him with controversial questions. Buddha ceased to pay attention to him and spoke to the crowds around Him: "This man wishes not that which he sees. He seeks what he does not see. He will seek long in vain. He is not satisfied by what he sees around him and his desires are limitless. Greetings to those who have renounced desire."

Buddha was affirmed as a doctrine of life, because the penetration of a high and goal-fitted Teaching into daily life marked a new era in the life of humanity. For the previous forbiddances and denials a positive and practical Teaching was substituted, in consequence of which the morality was raised to a higher standard.

It was ordained to abstain from all that was negative and with full energy to prompt the positive and beautiful.

Suicide was especially condemned by Buddha as was the taking of any life. "All tremble before punishment, all fear death; judging others by yourself, slay not, neither cause to slay." (Dhammapada.)

"The bhikshu abstains from all taking of life; shuns taking the life of any living creature. Laying aside cudgel and sword he is mild and merciful, kind and compassionate towards every living creature."

The consumption of alcohol was forbidden as well as the intoxication of others because drunkenness leads to downfall, crime, madness and ignorance, which is the main cause of a new and burdensome existence. The necessity of complete chastity for the achievement of full spiritual development was also pointed out. But to have one wife and to be loyal to her was regarded as a form of chastity. Polygamy was severely condemned by Gotama Buddha, as bred by ignorance.
The Teaching of Buddha did more for the liberation and happiness of woman than any other teaching of India. "Woman," Gotama said, "can attain the highest degree of knowledge open to man—she can become an Arhat. Freedom, which is beyond forms, cannot depend on sex, which belongs to the world of forms." Women played an important part in the communities and many of them were remarkable for their knowledge and striving.

We quote his answer to the question of the woman disciple Soma, "How can this condition which is difficult for the wise to attain be reached by a woman with her limited mind?"—"When the heart is at rest, when the consciousness is unfolded, then truth is perceived. But if one will think I am a woman, or I am a man, or I am this or that, let Mara be his concern." (Samyutta Nikāya, v. 1, p. 129.)

"The gates of immortality are open to all beings. Who has ears, let him approach, let him hearken to the Teaching and have faith." (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 170.)

Buddha indicated the absurdity of the prejudice ascribing a growing authority to words, on account of their being reiterated by an increasing number of scholars. A true scholar is one who has attained the perfection of realisation, not one who mumbles the formulas, previously rejected, numbers of times.

"I say to My pupils, 'Here is Nirvāṇa, here is the path to it.' Of those instructed by Me, a few attain, others do not. What can I do? The Blessed One is only the Indicator of the path." (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 3, p. 4.)

"No man may save his neighbor. The evil committed by man stains only the man himself. The evil avoided by him concerned him alone. Every one is pure or impure for himself only. No man may purify another."

Convalescence is possible only through an inner process of work upon oneself. Therefore Buddha did not acknowledge any active power behind formulae transmitted from generation to generation, "as a basket transmitted from hand to hand." (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 2, p. 169.)
Buddha, denying the conventional concept of God and affirming the possibility of liberation entirely by personal efforts and assiduous labor upon oneself, by this alone refuted outer worship. From the very beginning, he censured all rituals and other outer actions, which only help the recrudescence of spiritual blindness and clinging to lifeless forms. Nowhere in His Teaching is there even a hint of personal worship. He said: “The Teaching is salvation not because it was given by Buddha but because it liberates. The pupil who follows Me, clinging to the edge of My garment, is far from Me and I from him. Why? Because this disciple does not see Me. Another one may live hundreds of miles distant from Me and in spite of this be close to Me and I to him. Why? Because this disciple understands the Teaching; understanding the Teaching, he understands Me.” (Itivuttaka, p. 90.)

“If you understood and perceived the truth as it is, would you say: ‘We owe respect to our Teacher, and out of respect to Him, we shall speak as the Teacher spoke’?

“No, Blessed One.”

“That which you affirm is it not that which you perceived and realised yourself?”

“Yes, Blessed One.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 265.)

Foreseeing the future, Buddha said: “The Teaching is as the flame of a torch, kindling innumerable fires. Those fires may be used for the cooking of food or to disperse the darkness, but the flame of the first torch remains invariably luminous.” (Sutta, 42.)

Being an enemy of all ritual, Buddha denied the purifying power of bathing. “A man will not become morally pure through cleansing himself lengthily in water. A pure man, a brahmin, is one in whom abide truth and virtue.” (Udana, p. 6.) “The Gaya is the same sort of reservoir as any other reservoir.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 39.)

“All your rules,” said Buddha to the fanatics, “are base and ridiculous. Some of you walk naked, covering yourselves only with your hands; some will not eat out of a jug or a plate, will not sit at the table between two speakers, between two knives, or two plates; some will not sit at the common table and will not accept alms in a house where there is a pregnant woman, or where you will notice many flies or meet a dog.

"One nurtures himself only on vegetables, with a brew of rice, with cow or deer dung, roots of trees, branches, leaves, forest fruit or seeds. One wears his robe thrown only over the shoulder, or covers himself only with moss, the bark of a tree, plants or reindeer skin, wears his hair loose or puts on a hair band. One wears the garment of sorrow, always holds his hands up, does not sit on a bench or mat, or always sits in the manner of an animal.

"One lies on prickly plants or cow dung.

"I shall not enumerate other similar means by which you torture and exhaust yourselves.

"What do you expect, voluntary labourers, for your heavy work? You expect alms and respect from laymen and when you attain this aim you become strongly attached to the comforts of temporary life, you do not want to part with it and do not know the means for it. As soon as you notice visitors from afar you at once sit down and pretend to be absorbed in deep meditation, but after they depart you again do as you please, walk and rest freely.

"When given coarse food, without even tasting it, you give it back, but each tasty morsel you keep for yourself. Indulging in vices and passions you nevertheless garb yourselves in the mask of modesty. No, not such is the true achievement!

"Asceticism is useful only when it does not conceal covetous motives."

Asceticism has no value as a means of liberation from the bonds of earth: "It is more difficult to find a patient man than one who nurtures himself with air and roots or garbs himself in bark and leaves. When a man is weakened by hunger and thirst, when he is too tired to master his feelings and thoughts, can he reach the goal which is attained only by the clear mind of an expanded consciousness?" (Buddhacarita of Acvaghosha, v. 12.)

"In order that the strings of the vina should produce an harmonious sound, they should be neither too strained nor too loose. So with each effort: if it is excessive, it ends in a futile waste of energy; if it is niggardly, it turns into passivity."
“Practise with measurement; keep the correct measure in tension and establish the balance of your abilities.

“A disciplined man is free; being free, he is joyous, he is calm and happy.” Buddha wanted the life of the community to be joyous.

When He formulated the precepts for His son, He commanded him to treasure joy together with love, compassion and patience. (Muditta, Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 424.)

In order to cure oneself, one has to know one’s ailment, but the realisation of it does not give health; for that, the necessary condition is a manifestation of will.

Considering all existing manifestations as correlations of most refined energies, the Teacher valued especially the evidence of effort in His pupils. He never taught the subjugation of passions as such, but their transmutation and the sublimation of their quality: as at the basis of each passion, is contained the spark of energy without which no progress is possible.

Energy—will—makes the pupil vigilant and full of constant striving. These qualities arm him with patience, energy, sustained control—three indispensable conditions to crush the hordes of Māra, “as an elephant crushes a bamboo hut.” Patience is born of compassion and knowledge.

Of intolerance, it is pointed out that the mistakes of others are easily noticed but one’s own mistakes are perceived with difficulty. “A man sifts the misdeeds of his neighbor as the grain from the husk, but hides his own as the cheat hides the bad dice from the player.”

Nowhere do we see mention of non-resistance to evil; active condemnation and suppression of evil is everywhere. One should not submit to suffering, one must be daring in the perfection of good and not be satisfied with small achievements! “Like a beautiful flower, full of colour but without scent, so fruitless are the fine words of him who does not act in accordance with them.” (Dhammapada, ch. 20.)

“I indicated to My disciples the path which they must tread in order to manifest the four perfect efforts: To prevent the beginning of the harmful, evil thing if it be not yet manifested; to hinder its development if it be already manifested; to help the manifestation of useful things not yet manifested; and to strengthen those which are already manifested. Thus the disciple creates will, striving, develops courage, exercises the heart and fights.” (Majjhima Nikāya, 2.)

We can never call Buddha mild. On the contrary, He is the never-despondent Leader, the Fighter for community and for matter, the Hero of work and unity.

Buddha pointed out the necessity of co-measurement and goal-fitness. He said: “One should be neither less nor more.” His followers made of this formula of co-measurement the tiresome golden mean. Buddha likewise commanded the possession of fewer objects, in order not to allot too much time to them. This advice His followers transformed into pedantry. Buddha censured fanatics and advised that the body be treated according to the necessity of conditions. Where the body should be reduced for travel, the Teacher pointed out slenderness. But where the contagion of the atmosphere necessitated protection, the Teacher ordained food. In the Teaching of Buddha we find not only a materialistic philosophy but also the practical improvement of daily life.

The Teacher pointed out the necessity of harmony in a man’s forces, for the manifestation of the highest measure of knowledge and beauty, and for the scientifically vital necessity of cosmic economy for the general good.

“He will observe co-measurement in clemency, and, being resourceful in means, He will combine wisdom with compassion.” (Cūkśāsamuccaya, p. 38.)

“The charitable man has found the path of salvation. He is as a man who plants a sapling, thereby insuring shade, flowers and fruit for future years. Even so is the result of charity, even so is the joy of him who helps those that are in need of assistance. Even so is the great Nirvana.

“The immortal may be reached only by continuous acts of kindness; and perfection is accomplished by compassion and charity.”

Goal-fitness and compassion are vividly expressed in the following dialogue:

“Does the Blessed One pronounce a word which is false, destructive and disagreeable?”

“No.”

“If it is true, destructive and disagreeable?”

“Also not.”

“If true, useful and disagreeable?”

“Yes, when He finds it necessary.”

“If it be false, destructive and agreeable?”

“No.”

“True, useful and agreeable?”

“Yes, when He finds the time befitting.”

“Why does He act thus?”

“Because He has compassion towards all beings.” (Majjhima Nikāya, v. 1, p. 395.)

Many indications about the evidences of compassion are contained in the Sutras; one does not need to enumerate them, because in the last episode is contained all the refinement and the touching relation of Buddha to His neighbor:

“Chunda, the smith, hearing that Buddha had come to Pava and was stopping in the grove, went to Him and, paying Him reverence, asked the Blessed One to partake of his meal on the following day. Receiving His acceptance, Chunda departed and prepared all possible delicacies and also a large piece of juicy pork, for the following morning. The Blessed One accompanied by His disciples came to the home of the smith. Sitting down on the prepared seat, He addressed Chunda the smith:

"Chunda, bring me the pork thou hast preserved, but to the disciples give the other delicacies prepared by thee."

"Yes, Lord," replied the smith, and executed what was told.

"Then the Blessed One said: 'Chunda, bury whatever is left of the pork, for I know no being besides the Tathāgata who could digest it.'

"Yes, Lord," answered Chunda, and he buried the remains of the pork in the ground.

"Having partaken of food in the house of Chunda the smith, the Blessed One was stricken with severe sickness of the stomach and suffered terrible pain. He said to His disciple, Ananda, 'Arise, Ananda, we shall go to Kushinagara.' On the way the Blessed One stopped often, suffering great pain, thirst and anguish. Thus they reached the river Kakutkha. Having bathed here, the Blessed One stopped at the outskirts of the grove and, lying down on the outspread robes, said to Ananda: 'Ananda, it is possible that some one will harass the heart of Chunda the smith with the following speeches: "Chunda, what distress for thee! Thou must feel very unhappy that Tathāgata left the illusory world, after He accepted the meal in thy house."

"Ananda, dispel the heavy thoughts of Chunda by the following words: "Friend, thou must rejoice, for thy happiness lies in that this happened in such a manner. From the lips of Tathāgata Himself, I have heard and understood that two gifts of food receive equal appreciation and reward—verily, they receive a greater reward and blessing than others. Which two? That, after which the Tathāgata attains the highest and complete enlightenment and that, after partaking of which, He enters the liberation of Nirvāṇa." With such words, Ananda, should you dissipate the heavy thoughts of the smith Chunda.'"

(Mahāparanirvāṇa Sutra.)
The more deeply we penetrate into the Teaching of the Blessed One, the more vividly appear His boundless compassion and love, which permeate each of His thoughts and actions.

"Like a mother who protects her only child with her own life, cultivate such boundless love toward all beings!"

His all-embracing sympathy with all existing things extends even to the vegetable kingdom. He avoids destroying seeds and plant-life. In the Anguttara Nikāya the Blessed One says, "Whoever of my disciples cultivates mind-delivering love but for a moment, that disciple meditates not in vain and follows the Doctrine and the discipline of the Teacher; how much more those who cultivate the thought of love!"

In Ituvuttaka it is said, "All methods for the earning of merit in this life are not worth one-sixteenth part of love, the deliverance of mind. Love, the deliverance of mind, embraces them into itself, shining and glowing and beaming.

And as the shining of all stars does not equal one-sixteenth of the brightness of the moon, but as moonlight absorbs it unto itself, shining and glowing and beaming, so all methods for the earning of merit in this life are not worth one-sixteenth part of love, the deliverance of the mind.

"Love, the deliverance of the mind, embraces unto itself, shining, glowing and beaming.

"And, as in the last month of the rainy season in autumn, the sun in a clear and cloudless sky, mounting the firmament, clears away all darkness in the expanse of air, shining and glowing and beaming; and as, following the night, early at morning the morning star shines and glows and beams, even so all means for the earning of merit in this life is not worth one-sixteenth part of love, the deliverance of mind. Love, the deliverance of mind, embraces them unto itself, shining and glowing and beaming."

The love of Buddha was of so immeasurable a stream, that it could not be exhausted by any hate or hostility. On the contrary, such hostile attack only brought it to fuller unfoldment. Therefore, He ordained to His disciples, "However men may speak concerning you, whether appropriately or inappropriately, whether courteously or rudely, whether wisely or foolishly, whether kindly or maliciously, thus My disciples, must you train yourselves. Our minds should remain unsullied; neither should evil word escape our lips. Kind and compassionate will we ever remain, loving of heart, nor harbouring secret hate. And we will bathe that person with the unfailing stream of loving thought. And proceeding forth from him, embrace and flood the whole wide world with constant thoughts of loving kindness, wide, ample, expanding, immeasurable as the world, free from enmity, free from ill-will. Thus, disciple, must you train yourselves!” (Majjhima Nikāya, p. 127.)

Here we see that the love which His disciples had to cultivate was the boundless stream of kindness radiating to all four quarters of space, above and below, in all places, the wide world over.

According to the Teaching these waves of kindness, compassion or joy sent into space, reach a mind afflicted with sorrow and grief, which suddenly feels within itself a welling-up of peace and serenity.

Thought is energy and as such, acts in full conformity with its intensity and the impetus given to it.

Love, as taught by the Blessed One, being the deliverance of mind, was at the root of everything really great.

“The greatest of all is the loving heart.”
One more legend from Buddha's life. "The Blessed One sat above the waters of a deep lake. In its depths one could discern an entire world of fish and seaweeds. The Blessed One noticed how this small world resembled the courts of royalty, 'If man should sink there, he would destroy these ephemeral dwellings with his feet, but he himself would choke. Out of such depths the spirit of man does not arise.

"'But,' smiled the Teacher, 'for everything there is a remedy. One can shatter the rock and drain the lake. The snails will then have either to dry up or to find another place of existence. But man will not perish.'"

In Buddhist writings are often mentioned six teachers, philosophers, as Buddha's constant antagonists. Those were the philosophers who disputed the theoretical bases of Buddha's Teaching. Two hypotheses in the Teaching of Gotama Buddha were especially subject to attack: His Teaching about causes and His denial of the independent and unchangeable soul in man and in the universe—the very hypotheses which are so close to our contemporary trend of thought.

Affirming the reality which surrounds us and is visible to all, the Teacher pointed out the existence of the most subtle reality, which is attainable only through higher knowledge. The knowledge of this reality and the possession of this higher knowledge are usually imperceptible to our coarse sense-organs.

"If that which is realized by our feelings would exist as the only reality, then the fool, by right of birth, would possess the fundamental Truth; what, then, would be the use of all quests for the realization of the essence of things."

In our brains are centers, the opening of which gives possibility of possessing immutable knowledge. In this affirmation, we again see how the Teacher proceeded in a purely scientific direction, coinciding in this indication also with the affirmations of contemporary scientists concerning the many centers in our organism, the functions of which are yet unknown but which, according to the importance of the places they occupy, one may suppose to be of unusual significance.
The idea of God has its own interpretation for Buddhists, in accordance with the law of Karma and with the understanding of the necessity of personal efforts for one’s own liberation. “Who is it that shapes our lives? Is it Içvāra, a personal creator? If Içvāra be the maker, all living things should have silently to submit to their maker’s power. They would be as vessels formed by the potter’s hand; and if it were so, how would it be possible to practice virtue? If the world had been made by Içvāra there should be no such thing as sorrow, or calamity, or sin, for both pure and impure deeds must issue from Him. If not, there would be another cause besides Him, and He would not be the self-existent one. Thus you see, the thought of Içvāra is overthrown.

“Again, it is said that the Absolute has created us. But that which is absolute cannot be a cause. All things around us issue from a cause, as the plant issues from the seed; but how can the Absolute be the cause of all things alike? If it pervades them, then certainly, it does not produce them.

“Again, it is said that Self is the maker. But if Self is the maker why did he not make pleasing things? The cause of sorrow and joy are real and objective. How can they have been made by Self?

“Again, if you adopt the argument that there is no maker, that our fate is such as it is, and there is no causation, what use would there be in shaping our lives and adjusting means to an end?

“Therefore we argue that all things that exist are not without cause. However, neither Içvāra, nor the Absolute, nor the Self, nor causeless chance, is the maker but our deeds produce results both good and evil.

“The whole world is under the law of causation and the causes that are not un-mental, for the gold of which the cup is made is gold wrought. Let us not lose ourselves in vain speculations of profitless subtleties; let us surrender Self and selfishness and as all things are fixed by causation, let us practice good so that good may result from our actions.” (Vol. 19 of the Sacred Books of the East, Oxford, 1883.)

If the eternally changing existence of man excludes the hypothesis of a constant changeless entity, then the Universe, this complex of complexes, may be explained entirely without the necessity or even the
Two doctrines were especially condemned by Buddha: 1. The affirmation of the eternal unchanging soul. 2. The destruction of the soul after death. Both these doctrines were denied by the law of causal conception which establishes that all dharmas are at the same time causes and consequences.

Buddha denied the existence of a changeless soul in man and in all, as He saw in man and the whole universe only inconstancy and the transitional.

The thesis of the continuity of the stream of phenomena and the formula of the causality of conception exclude the existence of the eternal unchanging soul, individual as well as universal.

The connotation of the word "soul" is absolutely inadmissible for the Buddhist; because the thought that man can be a being separated from all other beings and from the existence of the whole universe, can neither be proved by logic nor supported by science. "In this world no one is independent. All that exists depends on causes and conditions." "Each thing depends upon another thing and the thing it depends upon is, in turn, not independent." (Bodhicaryāvatāra, v. 6, pp. 26-31.)

Buddha constantly taught that there is no independent "I" and that there is no world separated from it. There are no independent things, there is no separate life—all are only indissoluble correlatives. If there is no separate "I," we cannot say that this or that is mine, and thus the origin of the understanding of property is destroyed.

If the understanding of a permanent and independent human soul is to be rejected, what, then, in man gives him the sense of a permanent personality? The answer will be—trishnā or the craving for existence. A being who has generated causes for which he is responsible and possesses this craving, will, according to his Karma, be born anew.

Of one and the same complex of elements (dharmas) are born infinite combinations of skandhas of elements, which are manifested at the given time as one personality, and after a definite period of time appear as another, third, fourth, etc., ad infinitum. There occurs, not a transmigration, but an endless transformation of a complex of dharmas.
or elements—that is, a continuous regrouping of the elements—substrata which form the human personality.

Upon the quality of the new combination of skandhas—elements of the new personality—the last desire before death of the previous personality has a great influence: it gives direction to the liberated stream.

In Buddhism a man is regarded as an individuality, built by numerous existences, but only partially manifested in each new appearance on the earthly plane.

The individual existence, consisting of an entire chain of lives, which began, continue and finish in order to begin again, ad infinitum, is compared to a wheel or a year of twelve months, invariably repeated. The chain of the twelve nidanas becomes no longer a chain but the wheel of life, with twelve spokes. Once set in motion, the wheel of life, the wheel of the Law, will never stop: "The wheel of the benevolent Law in its unchangeable rotation crushes untiringly the worthless chaff, separating it from the golden grain. The hand of karma directs the wheel, its revolutions marking the beat of its heart."

All these changes of forms or of existence lead toward one goal—the attainment of Nirvāṇa; it means the full development of all possibilities contained in the human organism. But Buddhism teaches the cognizance and creation of good, independent of this aim, as the contrary would be absolute egoism, and such speculation is foredoomed to disappointment. As it is said, Nirvāṇa is the epitome of disinterestedness, complete renunciation of all personal for the sake of truth. An ignorant man dreams and strives to Nirvāṇa, without any realisation of its true Essence. To create good with the view of gaining results or to lead a disciplined life for the attainment of liberation, is not the noble path ordained by Gotama. Without thought of reward or achievement life must be crossed, and such life is the greatest.

The condition of Nirvāṇa may be attained by man in his earthly Life.
tion and cannot conceive of the creation of something from nothing. "Nothing organic is eternal. Everything is in a state of continuous flux, undergoing change, transmutation, and sustaining the continuity according to the law of evolution."

"The world exists by cause. All things exist by cause. All beings are bound by cause." (Vaseththa Sutta.)

Regarding the constant change of the world, visible to our coarse organs, as well as its dissolution, Buddhism points out that those dissolutions are temporary and periodical; for, according to the principle of evolution, guided by the law of individual and collective karma, the disappearing world will in turn manifest a new world with all its contents, as our universe was manifested from the primary substance—matter.

Denying miracles, the Teacher pointed out the concealed powers of human nature which, when developed, can produce the so-called miracles.

The method of developing these powers is interpreted in Buddhist books and is known under the name of the science "Iddhi-Vidhānana," which points out two forms of manifestation of these powers and two ways to attain them. One, the lower, is reached by way of various ascetic and other physical practices; the other higher one, embracing all possible manifestations, is attained by the power of inner development.

The first method of developing these powers is not lasting and may be lost, whereas inner development can never be lost. Its mastery is attained by following the noble way indicated by Buddha.

All these hidden powers gradually unfold in man usually of themselves, in proportion to man's mastery of the lower expressions of his nature in a whole series of previous lives.

For the development of power of the higher grade, four conditions are indispensable: 1. will; 2. its exertion; 3. mental development; 4. the discrimination between truth and error. A man possessing those powers of knowledge, increasing nature's powers, can perform the most unusual miracles; in other words, he can produce any scientific experiment. Buddha did not encourage manifestations of powers, which lead only to confusion in minds ignorant of the principles which are represented by those manifestations and which create a heavy atmosphere of forcibly disturbed elements.

The “Mahāparanirvāṇa Sutra” tells about an unusual light emanating from the body of Buddha which was observed by His nearest disciple Ananda. The Teacher pointed out that in two circumstances could such physical radiation be visible to the physical eye: 1. at the time of the great enlightenment of the man who became Buddha; 2. on the night when such a man—Buddha—finally departed.

Studying the Buddhist sources one may find many valuable indications about the purely physical manifestation of radiation. It is indicated as of a luminous and most subtle quality which surrounds man and is the nearest inward factor of human perception. “This matter is exceedingly fine, as the radiance of a diamond, imponderable, incombustible, disappearing after death without any traces. Nevertheless it is atomic.”

Nowadays this radiation is known to Europeans under the name of aura. This radiation is quite normal and it has been scientifically proved that not only all human and animal organisms possess it, but even trees, plants and stones.

The first of the scholars and scientists to point out this characteristic was Baron Reichenbach. He proved this radiation to be quite natural and his experiments were expounded in detail in his “Researches of 1844-45.”

Similarly in Paris, Dr. Baraduc took photographs of this radiation, and now in London, America and Berlin whole institutions are devoted to the study of human emanations—auras. It has been proved that this radiation may be of different shades, that it expands in volume, and grows in intensity of light, according to the spiritual and intellectual development of the man. Such manifestations as sudden flashes of colored rays emanating from the shoulders have also been noted. But science has not found any explanation for the origin of such flashes. Mention has been made of the decrease in power of the light of these emanations during ailing conditions of the organism.

In her book, “The Magnetic Aura of the Cosmic Man,” Mar-Galittu (Mrs. J. P. Reimann) * writes:

“Professor Yourevitch of Moscow points out the

* Published by Fr. P. Reiss, Trier, Schliessbach 186.
Y-rays of the human aura, as a newly discovered, highly powerful and invisible radiation.

"After a decade of detailed experiment, Professor Yourevitch brought the results of his investigations before the International Psychological Congress, which took place last year at Copenhagen.

"The difference between the human emanations and those of Radium and the Roentgen Rays is that human emanations are far subtler and can penetrate dense walls, whereas the Roentgen Rays and Radium depend upon a definite density of the bodies which they penetrate. The emanations, for instance, transform gaseous streams, otherwise non-conductors, into remarkable conductors of magnetic force. Their far-reaching conductivity is the chief basic quality of the Y-rays. Without respect for distance and intensity, these gaseous streams become conductive under the influence of human emanations. Their far-reaching and penetrative power is conditioned by the cosmic contact of human emanations and therefore they are conceded to have a stronger effect than all other rays.

"Beyond their capacity for far-reaching conductivity and power of penetration, the Y-rays have the power, when piercing thick obstructions, to exercise mechanical functions as well. When piercing thick metal plates, the Y-rays cause molecular sediments as soon as the rays pass through in a consciously concentrated way. During certain experiments they induce refraction of light-waves. They may also be photographed. The Y-rays of the aura are at the basis of levitation and telekinetic phenomena. The work of Professor Yourevitch, which is called ‘Y-rays as Conductors of Bio-physical Energy’ contains fifty photographs of his experiments."

The contemporary theory of hypnotic suggestion may be found in the following legend about Chullapanthaka in the Pāli commentaries of Dhammapada:

"Chullapanthaka was a disciple who had mastered some of the powers. On the same day Buddha sent for him and when the messenger reached the Samgha, he saw three hundred disciples sitting in a group, each of them an exact image of the other. To his question, ‘Which is Chullapanthaka?’ every one of the three hundred answered, ‘I am Chullapanthaka.’ The messenger returned to his Teacher disconcerted, but Buddha ordered him to return immediately and if the same thing would occur, to take the first one who called himself Chullapanthaka by the hand and bring him to Buddha.” The Teacher knew that the disciple desired to display his newly acquired power, by suggesting to the consciousness of the messenger his illusive image. This power is called “Mahāmāyā Iddhi” and in order to manifest it, Chullapanthaka had vividly to represent in his mind his own image and then to suggest it up to the desired number in the consciousness of the messenger.

In the same way, contemporary scientific data support the theory of Karma expounded in Buddhism. Contemporary science teaches that each generation of man is heir to the distinctive characteristics of preceding generations, not only in mass but in individual cases.

Psychology finds its raison d'être in that exclusive and strong attention, which Buddha apportions to the process of the mind, to the purification and expansion of consciousness of His disciples in affirming thought as the dominant factor in the evolution of the all-existent. The psychological processes in Buddhism are closely connected with physiology.

Buddhism does not trace any line of demarcation between psychic processes and matter. The psychic processes are regarded as the manifestations of the subllest qualities of matter.

In the “Dialogue of Buddha,” Part II, we find an indication about the existence in addition to a physical body of a mental body which is its exact counterpart and which can be externalized at will and become active at great distances.

“With his mind thus concentrated, completely purified, utterly clear, devoid of depravity, free of taint, ready to act, firm and imperturbable, he applies and directs it to the evoking of the mental body. He evokes out of this body another body, having form, made of thought-stuff, having all limbs and parts, not lacking any organ. It is as if a man were to pull out a reed from its sheath. He would know: ‘This is the reed, this is the sheath. The reed is one thing, the sheath another. It is from the sheath that the reed has been drawn forth.’ Just so, the bhikshu calls up from this body another body, having form, made of thought-stuff, having all limbs and parts, not lacking any organ.”
Asserting the indestructibility of energy, Buddha regarded the all-existent as aggregates of the finest energies.

For the physicist of today the moving power is matter, man’s perception of matter being the response of his senses to the vibrations of energy.

And what is dharma, if not energy?

Dharmas, according to Buddhism, exist for us by their effects; all our perceptions being, above all, dharmas.

Therefore translating this formula into the contemporary language, we may say that all sense-perceptions are exclusively energy effects and energy is the only real existing entity.

Similarly His affirmations about thought acting at a distance antedate our researches in the domain of thought-transmission and wireless. Since thought is energy then, as such, it is subject to the same law in its action as any other energy. We know that the Hertzian waves are emitted for a thousand miles into space without any wires, with the result that they can be caught by any equally attuned receiver. Why, then, cannot man send out a thought-energy which will evoke identical vibrations in the man susceptible to them?

Thus, Buddha is our predecessor in many domains of knowledge.

Buddha also pointed out the difference that exists between the evident and the reality. His comparison of the evident to a mirage or illusion (Maya) is applicable to any contemporary discussion.

This Great Wisdom, if studied not in letter but in its spirit, would enrich an unprejudiced mind with many a priceless gem.

The philosophy of Buddhism may be termed the analysis of separate elements attracted into combination by the formation of a definite individual stream. The individual stream is accumulated and fed by numberless manifestations of man on the earth, in other planes and other worlds. Absorbing all the characteristics of each manifestation, this stream swells in possibilities, transforming and remaining eternally self-containing. True individuality, true immortality, is contained in the realization of the true “I” which is constructed by innumerable combinations of human manifestations.
"All concern about the personality is in vain; the self is as a mirage, all tribulations that touch it will pass away. They will vanish as a nightmare when the sleeper awakens."

In Buddhism man is not a futile pygmy as he is in the representation of the Western mind, but the Lord of the worlds. Being part of the Cosmos, like it he is limitless in his possibilities.

The data about cosmic creation, about the existence of innumerable world systems in eternal motion, which are manifested and dissolved; the affirmations of the inhabitance of the multitude of worlds and about the full coordination of organisms which populate these worlds with the properties and structure of their planet, coincide with those scientific problems which at present agitate the minds of the true scientists.

Thus, contemporary science in accord with the affirmation of fundamental Buddhism, confirms the very realistic essence of this Teaching of the reality of the life-creative essence of great matter, impressed for the first time.

Let us pay due homage to that Great Mind which, impelled by a powerful Spirit, fathomed the very foundations of Existence, solved the problems of life and pointed out the goals of evolution as conscious cooperation with the Cosmos and communion with the far-off worlds.
No teaching foresaw the future with such precision as Buddhism. Parallel with reverence to Buddha, Buddhism develops the veneration of Bodhisattvas—future Buddhas. According to the tradition, Gotama, before reaching the state of Buddha, had been a Bodhisattva for many centuries. The word, Bodhisattva, comprises two concepts: Bodhi—enlightenment or awakening, and Sattva—the essence. Who are these Bodhisattvas? The disciples of Buddhas, who voluntarily have renounced their personal liberation and, following the example of their Teacher, have entered upon a long, weary thorny path of help to humanity. Such Bodhisattvas appear on earth in the midst of the most varying conditions of life. Physically indistinguishable in any way from the rest of humanity, they differ completely in their psychology, constantly being the heralds of the principle of the common welfare.

Buddha, directing all possibilities towards the affirmation of evolution, bid His disciples venerate the future Buddhas more than the Buddhas of the past. “Thus as the new moon is more worshipped than the full moon, so those who have faith in Me must reverence Bodhisattvas more than Buddhas.” (Madhyamakāvatāra.)

History has not revealed to us elsewhere such a living example of self-denial. According to tradition, the Blessed One preordained the Bodhisattva Maitreya as His successor.

And the Blessed One said to Ananda, “I am not the first Buddha who has come upon earth, nor shall I be the last. In due time another Buddha will arise in the world, a Holy One, a supremely enlightened One endowed with wisdom, auspicious, embracing the Universe, an incomparable Leader of Men, a Ruler of devas and mortals. He will reveal to you the same eternal truths, which I have taught you. He will establish His Law, glorious in its origin, glorious at the climax and glorious at the goal in the spirit and in the letter. He will proclaim a righteous life wholly perfect and pure, such as I now proclaim. His disciples will number many thousands while mine number many hundreds.”

Ananda said, “How shall we know Him?”
The Blessed One said, "He will be known as Maitreya."

The future Buddha Maitreya, as His name indicates, is the Buddha of compassion and love. This Bodhisattva, according to the power of His qualities, is often name Ajita—the Invincible.

It is interesting to notice that reverence of many Bodhisattvas was accepted and developed only in the school of Mahāyāna. Nevertheless the reverence of the one Bodhisattva Maitreya, as a Successor chosen by Buddha Himself, is accepted also in Hinayāna. Thus the one Bodhisattva Maitreya embraces the complete scope, being the personification of all aspirations of Buddhism.

What qualities must Bodhisattva possess? In the Teaching of Gotama Buddha and in the Teaching of Bodhisattva Maitreya, given by Him to Asanga according to tradition in the IVth century (Mahāyāna-Sutrālamkāra), the maximum development of energy, courage, patience, constance of striving and fearlessness was first of all underlined. Energy is the basis of everything, as it alone contains all possibilities."

"Buddhas are eternally in action; immovability is unknown to them, like the eternal motion in space, the actions of the Sons of Conquerors manifest themselves in the worlds."

"Mighty, valiant, firm in His step, not rejecting the burden of an achievement for the General Good."

"There are three joys of Bodhisattvas; the joy of giving, the joy of helping and the joy of eternal perception. Patience always, in all and everywhere. The Sons of Buddha, the Sons of Conquerors, Bodhisattvas in their active compassion are the Mothers to the All-existing." (Mahāyāna-Sutra.)

Throughout the entire Buddhist world the rocks on the roadsides, with the images of Maitreya, point out the approaching future. From the most ancient times until now this Image has been erected by Buddhists who know the approach of the New Era. In our day, venerable lamas, accompanied by disciples, painters and sculptors, travel through the Buddhist countries, erecting new images of the Symbol of aspirations towards the radiant future.
The Teaching of Buddha must be verified and should be given for broad knowledge. In our time, it is strange to think about the community and not to know the foundations of the first Scientist-Exponent of the community. The hand of Buddha was tireless in preparing the experiment of the world’s laboratory. The fact that Buddha ordained the world community as the evolution of humanity, alone gives to His Teaching its fiery persuasion.

In Buddha’s structure one may move through endless stories and the doors everywhere will be open to the call of the community. The exact knowledge of Buddha permitted Him to determine the exact condition of His contemporaries and to perceive the universal community only in the far-off future.

Respect to Buddha was such that no one obscured the image of the Teacher with the garb of divinity. Buddha is impressed on minds as a Man, a Teacher Who affirms. In this leonine fiery affirmation he attained the prevision of Maitreya—the Symbol of the Era of comprehension of the greatness of matter and affirmation of the great universal community!

Said the Blessed One, “Distinguish between those who understand and those who agree. He who understands the Teaching will not tarry in applying it to life, he who agrees will nod and extol the Teaching as remarkable wisdom, but will not apply this wisdom to life.

“There are many who have agreed, but they are like a withered forest, fruitless and without shade. Only decay awaits them.

“Those who understand are few, but like a sponge they absorb the precious knowledge and are ready to cleanse the horrors of the world with the precious liquid.

“He who understood cannot but apply the Teaching, because realizing goal-fitness, he accepts it as a solution of life.

“Do not waste much time with the agreeing ones. Let them first demonstrate the application of the first call.”

“Thus is attributed to the Blessed One the goal-fitting attitude to newcomers.”
It means that the purification of the Teaching will rest not only in the acceptance of its foundations, but in its application into life. An abstract understanding of the Teaching of the Blessed One is impossible. We see how greatly it penetrates into life when we realize how entire countries fell away from the Teaching, when instead of applying it to life they turned it into abstract discourses. In Tibet a lessening of the religious interest is apparent. One may even notice the increase of the Teaching of Bon-Po, the antithesis of Buddhism.

The Tashi Lama found it impossible to remain in Tibet. Following his example many of the best lamas have left Tibet. Without these educated lamas, the religious life of Tibet has become dormant.

Such examples are useful in observing how the distortion of the Teaching is effected.

At the same time one may see what victory the Teaching carries into other countries, where people are concerned with applying the foundations into life.

The same task is solved by the new tendency towards toleration of the followers of Hinayana.

Buddha, as the source, and Maitreya as a universal hope will unite the austere followers of the Teaching of the South with the multiformity of the North.

That which is most essential for the immediate future will definitely manifest itself. Instead of swelling the Teaching with commentaries, it will again be restored to the beauty of the value of concise conviction. The new time of the Era of Maitreya is in need of conviction. Life in its entirety must be purified by the flame of achievement. The great Buddha, Who preordained Maitreya, prescribed the path for the whole of existence. To those wise and clear covenants, is the manifestation of the new evolution calling.

The demand for the purification of the Teaching is not accidental. The dates are approaching. The image of Maitreya is ready to rise. All Buddhas of the past have combined Their wisdom of experience and have handed it on to the Blessed Coming One.

The lama proclaims, “Let life be firm as adamant; victorious as the banner of the Teacher; mighty as an eagle and may it last for eternity.”

* * *